And where the footpath climbed the brae, beyond the plank bridge, there were little scarlet wild strawberries among the grass – as red as holly berries, as red as the hood of little

RED RIDING HOOD.

She gathered them in a dock leaf and put them in her basket.

Nobody saw her pass.

ONCE UPON A TIME there was a village child who was so pretty – so pretty as never was seen.

Her mother was fair silly about her, and her granny was sillier still.

The good woman, her mother, made the child a little hood of scarlet flannel, and the scarlet set off her bonny black curls, like the flame-coloured leaves round the heart of a poppy flower.

Wherever she went she wore it; and folks called her “Little Red Riding Hood.”

THE MYRTLE smelled sweet in the warm, sunny glades, and the west wind blew softly through the wood.

It brought a cheerful sound – the clink of axes and voices of woodcutters singing at their work.

*"Sing ash, sing oak, sing charcoal smoke!
Sing hey the merry gean cherry!
Lay beech and bark for the windward screen,
Blue smoke and hazel and copse-wood green,
Sing hey for the woodland merry!"*

Another voice far off amongst the trees took up the song –

"Here's ash and oak for the broad axe stroke, Hey down come the red gean cherry!"

The cheerful voices died away in the distance.

And that was the end of little Red Riding Hood.
